Abstract of the Disclosure

A method classifies data into multiple classes so that the data in each class have a class-conditional probability distribution. The class-conditional probability distributions of measured data are projected into a likelihood space. The projected class-conditional probability distributions in the likelihood space are then classified according to a discriminant classifier in likelihood space.